word "Metaphysical" has been used for Donne and his followers. However, the term is an unfortunate one for it implies a process of dry reasoning, a speculation about the nature of the universe, the problem of life and death, etc. Donne's poetry is not metaphysical in the true sense of the word. His poetry does not expound any philosophical system of the universe, rather it is as much concerned with his emotions and personal experience as any other poetry. No doubt, there is much intellectual analysis of "emotion" and "experience" but this by itself cannot be called metaphysical. The poetry of the school of Donne is not metaphysical as far as its content is concerned.

Donne's poetry may be called "m-taphysical", only in as far as its technique or style is concerned. It is heavily overloaded with "conceits", which may be defined as the excessive use of over-elaborated similes and metaphors, drawn from the most far-fetched, remote and unfamiliar sources. Poets have always perceived similarity between dissimilar objects and used similes and metaphors to convey their perception of that similarity. The peculiarity of the metaphysicals lies in the fact that : (1) They use figures of speech excessively, (2) Their similes and metaphors are far-fetched and are often drawn from the most unfamiliar sources, (3) Their similes are elaborated to the farthest limit. (4) The relationship they perceive are not obvious. They are difficult to understand, (5) Their images are logical and intellectual, rather than sensuous or emotional. In their "conceits" Donne and his followers constantly bring together the abstract and the concrete, remote and the near, the spiritual and the material, the finite and the infinite, the sublime and the commonplace. His mind moves with great agility from one such concept to another, and it requires an equal agility on the part of the readers to follow him. Hence the difficult nature of his poetry and hence the charge of obscurity that has been brought against it. The charge of obscurity is further increased by the extreme conceit and the density

7. In order to arrest attention often a poem begins abruptly and colloquially, and unusual rhythms are used. Unusual, compound words are also used for the same purpose.

8. It is often dramatic in form. As has been well said, his poetry presents "a drama of ideas". Metaphysical lyrics are dramatic.

(C) NEO-CLASSICISM OR PSEUDO-CLASSICISM

'The Classic', Defined and Explained

In the history of English literature, the period of over one hundred years from 1660 to 1789 is variously called to Augustan Age, the classical age or the Pseudo-classical age or the age of Neo-classicism. It is called the Augustan age because the writers of the period supposed that their age was an age of brilliant writers like the age of King Augustus of ancient Rome. The charge of obscurity that their poetry had the same qualities as the poetry of the
